ABSTRACT

The media aids in bringing to light many social issues across the nation each and every day. Historically, police force on African Americans can be seen amongst many media outlets. However, with technological advances the media has flourished which makes it possible for the media to supply coverage of police force on African Americans more now than ever before. This exploratory analysis aimed to uncover ways in which the media has framed the individuals involved in the shooting of Michael Brown in Ferguson, Missouri on August 9, 2014. Articles from four media outlets were used in this analysis. Data was collected from the articles that specifically focused on terms and phrases used to describe the deceased and the officer involved as well as the altercation between the two individuals involved. Results of the analysis show that specific words to identify and describe the deceased and officer involved were used at a much higher rate in national news outlets as opposed to a local news outlet from Missouri. These results are specifically discussed as well as limitations and ideas for further research on the data that was collected and use.

CHAPTER ONE: INTRODUCTION

Public unrest in the wake of police force on African Americans is a topic people from every generation can say they have witnessed or have been a part of throughout history. From the Watts riots in 1965, the Rodney King riots that erupted in 1992, and the 2014 Ferguson unrest, public outcry over the treatment of African Americans by police officers is nothing new. Also, the news media has played a huge role in the framing of such events, and participation in these historical riots and/or protests can be largely attributed to the incredible circulation and power of mass media (Oberschall 1968). Over the years, media attention has fluctuated in its coverage of the unrest that has proceeded events involving police force against African Americans. Because of the huge influence the media plays in shaping public opinion, the purpose of this thesis is to explore the coverage of the shooting of an unarmed black teen, Michael Brown, by a police officer on August 9, 2014 in Ferguson, Missouri. More specifically, articles from four major news sources will be explored and evaluated to determine how the event and people involved were framed by each news source specifically.

The media has played a role in the transpiring of events and public opinion in the aftermath of the initial incidents that led to the Watts riots, the Rodney King riots, and the more recent Ferguson unrest. In 1965, the riots that broke out in Watts, Los Angeles following an altercation between an African American male and police officer were televised. Immediately following this original incident, word spread like wildfire and news sources were reporting on it (Oberschall 1968). This news coverage, although limited to the few major news outlets that existed at the time, was said to be the fuel that ignited such a huge outpour of individuals to participate in the riots that occurred in the following days (Oberschall 1968). In the 1960's communities were extremely segregated by race and with the migration of African Americans out of the deep south and into areas like Los Angeles, neighborhoods were changing. With the formation of different areas heavily populated by specifically white or black individuals, the white community was mostly informed of opinions and events within the black community via mass media. In 1971 Johnson, Sears, and McConahay believed that the circulation of mass media reports could result positively because it may relay “the attitudes, feelings, lifestyles, and even the very existence of black people” to the white community (Johnson, Sears, McConahay 1971; pp. 702). Although the media did play an important role in the spread of information regarding the Watts Riots and the altercation that ultimately ignited the riots, it is important to note that media at that time was nowhere near as advanced as it was during the Rodney King Riots or today.

The media also played a large part in the coverage and circulation of the videotaped beating of African American male, Rodney King, by multiple police officers in 1991 (Maurantonio 2014). The police force used against King in an altercation in Los Angeles was deemed “excessive,” and the recording of the incident sparked another huge outpouring of individuals in the form of riots and protests (Maurantonio 2014; pp. 751). The news media circulated the video of King’s beating so frequently, that it was deemed “one of the most watched pieces of amateur video in history” (Maurantonio 2014; pp. 742). This incident took media coverage to a different level than previously seen or reported during the Watts Riots. For instance, the altercation that ignited the Watts Riots was not videotaped. With the advancement of technology and media as a whole, the recording of Rodney King’s beating by police officers brought about a completely new type of media coverage.

Riots and protests occurred in great numbers following the acquittal of all four officers that were charged in the beating of Rodney King and tensions were higher than ever in an area with an already high rate of racial conflict (Marks, Barreto, Woods 2004). While it is extremely important to keep the public informed of events such as these that show a huge conflict between different groups of individuals, the media may not always portray things exactly how or why they occurred. Many scholars conclude that during the unrest that took place after the acquittal of the police officers involved in the beating of Rodney King, the media pushed the message of racial conflict to an extreme and that it was overstated (Marks, Barreto, Woods 2004; Valle and Torres 2000; Hunt 1997). This is evidence of the great power the media holds in shaping public opinion.

According to Nancy Berns, the media shapes and portrays events in ways that will best sell their product. In this case the products are newspapers, magazines, and even televised content (Berns 2004; p. 3). Although Berns focuses more so on domestic violence and the framing of victims by the media, her sociological theory can very well be used as a lens to look at the framing of all victims by the media (Berns 2004). Since the media was involved in the aftermath of each of these historic events, this exploratory content analysis has examined four media outlets and their portrayals of the incident in Ferguson, Missouri. Along with this, I have examined the media coverage of the actual event that sparked such an uproar regarding excessive police force and African American males. Before doing so, however, it is important to begin with a historical platform to support the claim that this is nothing new in the United States.

CHAPTER TWO: THE WATTS RIOTS

On August 11, 1965 Marquette Frye, an African American male, was pulled over by a police officer for driving over the speed limit. The officer noticed that Frye was drunk and notified him that he was under arrest for driving while intoxicated. As this situation was transpiring, a passerby and acquaintance of Frye, ran to Frye's home just a short distance away to notify Frye's family of what was happening. Not long after that, Marquette Frye's mother, Lena Frye, arrived at the scene, which now included back-up police officers, and began to argue with them. Chaos erupted when Marquette, who had originally been cooperative with the police officer, began to resist arrest. It was reported that Marquette became uncooperative due to embarrassment after his mother arrived (Matei & Ball-Rokeach 2005). Marquette grew increasingly uncooperative when the police officer attempted to put him in the patrol car. At this point a crowd began to form around Marquette, Lena Frye and the police officers. It was reported that the force used to restrain Marquette Frye by the police officers was excessive in nature (Matei & Ball-Rokeach 2005).

In 1965, Watts, a small neighborhood in Los Angeles, was a predominately black community. The crowd that formed around the Fryes and the police officers were, thus, predominately black individuals. Soon after a crowd of roughly 1,000 black individuals had formed, even more chaos erupted, but now it was between the crowd and the officers. The bystanders began throwing things at the officers and their patrol cars before some of the police began to retreat. However, even as they tried to retreat, the uproar grew even more intense. Before retreating completely, some officers tried to arrest individuals who spit on and threatened them but as the crowd grew in extreme number, the police were outnumbered and decided to retreat completely. While the police were retreating, people began throwing rocks and other objects at patrol cars which then led to the destruction of vehicles driving by on the streets. For the 5 days that followed the initial incident, a riot ensued which ended in the death of 34 individuals, 1,032 injuries, and millions of dollars in property damage of buildings burned and looted (Pfeffer 1967; Matei & Ball-Rokeach 2005). The riot that occurred in Watts over the span of roughly 5 days was so intense that Los Angeles police were completely thrown on how to handle it. As the number of rioters grew, the police realized that they were not equipped or prepared to handle that kind of situation (Miller 2001). After the Watts riots, the mayor of Los Angeles at the time, Mayor Sam Yorty, did little to nothing to mend the underlying issues of poverty and despair that led to the outrage and ensuing riot (Dreier 2003).

The underlying causes of the riot that erupted have been speculated and examined by many scholars since the historic event occurred over those 5 days. The excessive force used on Marquette Frye, and his arrest that followed, brought to the surface years of discrimination, unemployment, poverty, and all around frustration by the black community (Pfeffer 1967). As this was a relatively new phenomenon in the world of mass media, it was the first time riots of this kind were aired on television. This media coverage, in the form of print media and television broadcasts, brought extreme amounts of attention to the neighborhood of Watts and Los Angeles in general, and immediately following the riot, hundreds of studies were conducted by researchers across the country with a focus on the Watts riot.

CHAPTER THREE: THE RODNEY KING RIOT (1992)

On March 3, 1991 in Los Angeles, California, Rodney King, an African American male, was involved in a high speed police chase on a Los Angeles freeway. After running multiple lights over the course of the police chase, King, who was intoxicated, stopped his vehicle. The two passengers in his car were arrested but King continued to resist the officer's advances to arrest him. With the arrival of back-up officers, they successfully got King on his knees, but still continued to beat him while he was on the ground. The police officers struck King with batons over fifty times during the beating (Miller 2001).

Everything that transpired outside of the car on the Los Angeles freeway was videotaped and the photographer behind the camera sold the footage a news station in the area. The televised news media played a more influential role at the time than broadcasting. When the amateur footage was aired multiple times and circulated throughout the greater Los Angeles area via televised broadcast, the public was outraged and the incident was deemed to be a definite use of excessive force by police officers. Even more than police brutality alone, this event sparked racial outrage as the four police officers videotaped in the beating were all white. The incident was deemed by the Black community as being racially motivated.

All four police officers involved in the beating were indicted on felony assault charges and were tried in the predominately white area of the Simi Valley in Los Angeles. On April 29, 1992 an all-white jury found three of the police officers not guilty and failed to reach a verdict on the fourth police officer (Miller 2001). Total chaos erupted all over Los Angeles immediately following the announcement that the police officers were found not guilty. The riots that followed the public announcement of the verdict lasted several days, and the inability to get a handle on the situation led many to believe that the police officers had not learned anything from the Watts riot that occurred decades prior (Miller 2001). The riots that ensued resulted in 50 deaths, thousands of injuries, and roughly $1 billion in damage to property throughout the Los Angeles area (Dreier 2003; Miller 2001).

In the wake of the aftermath of the 1992 Los Angeles riots, politicians and businessmen hoped to create a plan to tackle the social and economic problems of the impoverished neighborhoods within Los Angeles (Dreier 2003). With a topdown approach, Mayor Tom Bradley who was voted into office after Sam Yorty in 1973, hoped to fix the problem of extreme joblessness by creating The Rebuild LA program. However, the program failed to reach its goal of over $4 billion needed to begin to fix the joblessness by only raising and investing $400 million over its five year long run (Dreier 2003; pp. 40). Today work is still being done to tackle the social and economic problems that have plagued mostly black and hispanic neighborhoods in Los Angeles.

CHAPTER FOUR: FERGUSON UNREST

According to the latest census information, in 2010 the population in Ferguson, Missouri was 21,203. This makes up a small amount of the state as a whole with the state population in 2010 at 5,988,927 (Census 2010). The racial make-up of Ferguson, Missouri at that time was far from equally dispersed. Whites (not Hispanic or Latino) made up 28.7% of the Ferguson, Missouri population and Black or African American made up 67.4%. Roughly the remaining 3.3% of the population, in terms of race are American Indian and Alaska Native, Asian, two or more races, and Hispanic or Latino. The median household income as documented in the 2010 census was $38,685. This was lower than the Missouri state median income which was $47,380. The percentage of individuals below the poverty level in Ferguson, Missouri was 24.9% which is higher than the state of Missouri's total percentage of individuals below the poverty level at 15.5% (Census 2010).

Decades after the Watts riot of 1965 and the Rodney King riots of 1992, use of excessive police force by white officers is still an issue. On August 9, 2014, an unarmed African American teenager, Michael Brown, was fatally shot by a white police officer in Ferguson, Missouri. The killing of Michael Brown has led to riots, protests, and vigils in not just Ferguson, Missouri but across the nation. There was a presence of mass media during the Watts riot of 1965 and Rodney King riots of 1992, but decades later media is far more advanced. The advancements in media and communication over the years has greatly impacted the coverage of the Ferguson unrest and the event that ultimately sparked it. The extremely broad media coverage of the events in Ferguson are far and above the media coverage at the time of the Watts and Rodney King altercations and riots that followed. During the first week of protests after the killing of Michael Brown, police were in full force shooting rubber bullets and using tear gas on groups of protesters. It is evident that the police are handling the riots and protests that have ensued after the killing of Michael Brown in very different ways than the Los Angeles police did during the Watts and King riots (Hahn 2014).

Although the police retaliation towards rioters and protesters of the Watts riots of 1965, Rodney King riots of 1992, and Ferguson unrest of 2014 may be different, connections can still be drawn from all three events. For instance, each event involved white police officers using excessive force on African American males. After each event, the excessive force was noted by the general public which sparked outrage among the Black communities in Los Angeles and Ferguson, Missouri. Through mass media, descriptions of each event spread like wildfire to the local communities as well as across the nation. It is with media circulation that the public is made aware of such events.

CHAPTER FIVE: SOCIOLOGICAL THEORY & MEDIA FRAMING OF VICTIMS

As the media has expanded over recent decades, more and more people rely on it to learn about social problems and world events. The media has become an outlet people turn to in order to learn about what is going on in the world around them. It is now easy to simply browse a newspaper's website to see the top stories of the day or even the top stories of the hour. With such easy accessibility, the media holds great power on its shoulders. Nancy Berns, a sociologist who focuses much of her work on how victims are framed by the media, explains that each media outlet frames their content to better appeal to certain audiences (Berns 2004). This means that different newspapers may frame individuals involved in news stories in ways that better appeal to their target audiences. Since most people obtain their knowledge of social problems and world events through the media, this can become a problem if they are not accurately portrayed. Opinions and ideas are shaped based on the content of news stories. If victims are not accurately portrayed in the media, readers are getting a skewed image of them and are then taking this frame of the victim and possibly sharing it with others. This can create a cycle of inaccurate victim framing (Berns 2004).

Because the media plays a large role in relaying information to the public, the purpose of this thesis is to examine how the fatal shooting of Michael Brown and the social unrest that followed was depicted in major media outlets. Within three major online news sources, I have examined multiple articles published by each to discover how the individual news outlets framed the initial shooting and the events that transpired afterwards.

CHAPTER SIX: DATA

In this exploratory content analysis I have examined four major media outlets and their portrayal of the Ferguson unrest as well as the event that led to that unrest. The four media outlets examined are The New York Times, The Wall Street Journal, The Huffington Post, and the St. Louis Post-Dispatch. All four sources have been heralded as prestigious news sources all while reporting on an array of topics from national to international news. I chose national news sources as well as a local Missouri news sources so that I could obtain a larger number of articles to examine in a broader scope along with more magnified news stories coming directly from Missouri.

The Wall Street Journal, known as a prestigious media source with a great following of readers and supporters, has been known as a leader in conservative journalism (Beddingfield 2012). Although the journalistic news stories are said to follow a non-bias approach, the editorial sections of the publication have been conservative leaning in nature (Beddingfield 2012). On the other side of the spectrum, The New York Times was chosen for this exploratory analysis because it has been heralded as a more liberal media news source (Senior 2009). With these two news sources known for having different political outlooks in their styles of journalism, there is variety in the articles gathered and there may be differences in the way in which articles from each source are written. As The Wall Street Journal and The New York Times are veterans in print media, I wanted to add another media source to give even more variety with the articles gathered. For this reason, I chose to include articles from The Huffington Post. I chose The Huffington Post because, unlike The Wall Street Journal and The New York Times, it is a digital-only media source and is relatively new to the world of journalism since it has only been around since 2005 (Manafy 2012). Lastly, the St. Louis Post-Dispatch was chosen as the fourth media outlet because it is a local news source straight from Missouri. This was done in hopes of gathering articles from not just national media outlets but a local media source closer to the event that occurred on August 9, 2014.

CHAPTER SEVEN: METHODS

This examination is exploratory in nature and will not be hypothesis driven. Using The New York Times, The Wall Street Journal, the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, and The Huffington Post as my four online media sources I have examined how the events in Ferguson, Missouri were been framed as well as the two individuals involved in the altercation. The altercation and killing of Michael Brown in Ferguson, Missouri occurred on August 9, 2014, and media attention grew strong even on the first day after the incident occurred (Loury 2015). Therefore, I began examining articles from August 10, 2014. On November 24, 2014, a grand jury came to the final decision to not indict the officer, Darren Wilson, who had fatally shot Michael Brown. As the grand jury decision was one that gained a great deal of attention, I believed that the media coverage I examined in the week prior to the announcement of their decision was heavily focused on the indictment. For that reason I decided to end the examination of articles on November 21, 2014, three days before the announcement of the grand jury's decision. When it came to the selection of articles to examine, I chose two articles focused on the events in Ferguson written from each news source every week within my timeframe, which is August 10, 2014 through November 2, 2014. In doing so, I wished to gain a sample that would allow me to examine the four news sources equally while still providing myself with enough data.

For this content analysis I created a spreadsheet that organized themes found in the wording of how the deceased individual and officer were portrayed. As a whole I wanted to organize the spreadsheet into deceased and officer portrayal, but even more specifically, I wished to explore how each media source characterizes the event as a whole. Therefore, there are four spreadsheets in total and three sections in each spreadsheet: deceased, officer, and event. Search engines were used on the websites of all four media outlets. The key words used to search for articles were "Michael Brown." These keywords were put inside quotation marks so that each search produced articles with the words “Michael” and “Brown” together. This style of search was used to better find articles specifically including the name of the deceased individual. Throughout history, it can be seen that these events of police brutality on black males are not new. Also, the riots and overall public unrest have occurred after each of these previously discussed events in similar fashion. Due to this being a repetitive form of unrest throughout history, with the media at the center of the circulation of the events that transpire, I will uncover the themes that emerge in the media’s portrayal of the killing of Michael Brown.

CHAPTER EIGHT: FINDINGS

Tables generated from the findings can be found at the end of this chapter. The tables represent the number of times specific terms were used to describe the deceased and the officer from all four media sources. Since the event as a whole was described in greater length and detail throughout all of the articles analyzed, summaries of the event from all four media sources are provided in this section.

The Wall Street Journal

This exploratory research of the news articles from August 10, 2014 to November 21, 2014 in The Wall Street Journal has shown that many terms were used to describe the deceased, Michael Brown, after the altercation between him and a police officer, Darren Wilson, on August 9, 2014. The names that were used to identify the deceased by name were Michael Brown, Mike Brown, and Mr. Brown. In the Wall Street Journal articles explored, the name Michael Brown was used 17 times, Mike Brown was used 1 time, and Mr. Brown was used 10 times when describing the deceased by name.

Once the deceased was identified in the articles, many other terms were used to describe him. In The Wall Street Journal articles, the various authors used the term “unarmed” to describe the deceased as he was unarmed at the time of the altercation with Darren Wilson. This term was used 20 times within the combined total The Wall Street Journal articles analyzed. The term “unarmed” was used in conjunction with many other descriptions of the deceased as well. For example, the deceased was described as an “unarmed 18-year-old,” an “unarmed African American teenager,” an “unarmed black teen/teenager,” an “unarmed black man,” an “unarmed teen/teenager,” and lastly, an “unarmed local teen/teenager.”

Throughout The Wall Street Journal articles analyzed, the majority of the authors included the age of the deceased. The deceased was identified as 18-years-old 11 times throughout The Wall Street

Journal articles analyzed. A variation of this was “18-year-old man,” which was used to describe the deceased twice in total throughout the articles analyzed. The deceased was identified more as a teen/teenager (15 times) than a man (2 times) throughout The Wall Street Journal articles.

When describing the race of the deceased, “black” and “African American” were used. The term “black” was used more to describe the deceased as it was used 11 times throughout the articles analyzed. “African American” as a racial descriptor was used a total of 2 times when describing the deceased. Both times “African American” was used to describe the deceased, it was followed by the term “teen” or “teenager.” “African American teen/teenager” was used a total of 2 times to describe the deceased.

In The Wall Street Journal articles analyzed from August 10, 2014 to November 21, 2014, the officer, Darren Wilson, was also identified and described. His full name, Darren Wilson, was used 14 times to identify him within the articles. The name “Mr. Wilson” was also used to identify him by name and it was used a total of 6 times. The term “officer” was used to identify Darren Wilson 23 times throughout The Wall Street Journal articles analyzed. This term was the most used to identify him. The term “officer” was used in conjunction with other terms to describe him as well. For example, he was described as a “white police officer” 7 times throughout The Wall Street Journal articles and a “Ferguson, MO police officer” 2 times throughout the articles. When it came to racial descriptors, the term “white” was used to describe Darren Wilson 8 times throughout the articles analyzed. The age of Darren Wilson was used to describe him in the articles as well. He was described as 28-years-old 1 time throughout The Wall Street Journal articles.

In The Wall Street Journal articles analyzed, the event as a whole was described and detailed. The altercation that occurred on August 9, 2014 was described throughout The Wall Street Journal articles outright as a “police shooting,” a “fatal shooting,” and a “police involved shooting.” These were immediate descriptors used to explain the event as a whole. Descriptive accounts of the event were also given by the authors of The Wall Street Journal articles analyzed. According to The Wall Street Journal articles, the deceased was tied to a convenience store robbery before he was involved in the altercation with the officer, Darren Wilson. However, Brown was stopped by the officer because he was walking in the middle of the street with one other individual. Authors of the articles explained that there were varying accounts of the altercation by police and witnesses. According to police, the officer confronted the deceased for walking in the middle of the street. Shortly thereafter, the officer began to get out of his vehicle which prompted the deceased to push the door to the vehicle shut. Following this, a struggle ensued. Both the police and family of the deceased alleged that the officer and the deceased had a struggle while the officer was in the patrol car which led to the initial firing of the officer’s gun.

Police and witness accounts of what happened outside of the patrol car vary. Police have said that after the struggle in the vehicle, the deceased ran from the officer but then turned and charged the officer. This is said, by police, to have been what prompted the officer to shoot the deceased multiple times. The family of the deceased and witnesses from the scene have had differing descriptions of what occurred outside of the patrol car. According to the family of the deceased and witnesses, the deceased was approaching the officer with his hands up when he was killed. They said that he was trying to defend himself with his hands. According to the Wall Street Journal articles analyzed, the gunshots were fired at the front of the deceased’s body. The deceased was struck at the top of his head once, struck once in the forehead, and four times in his arm. The articles only briefly discussed that unrest was sparked after the shooting of Michael Brown.

The New York Times

In The New York Times articles analyzed from August 10, 2014 to November 21, 2014, many terms and descriptors were used to describe the deceased, Michael Brown. The name identifier used to describe the deceased most often was “Michael Brown.” The name “Michael Brown” was used to identify the deceased 25 times throughout The New York Times articles analyzed. “Mr. Brown” was also used to identify the deceased and it was used 8 times throughout the articles. The last name used to identify the deceased was “Mike Brown” and it was used just 1 time throughout The New York Times articles.

The term “unarmed” was used many times to describe the deceased at the time of the altercation on August 9, 2014. “Unarmed” was used 20 times to describe the deceased throughout The New York Times articles. This term was used in conjunction with many other descriptors as well. For example, “unarmed African American teen/teenager”, “unarmed black teen/teenager,” “unarmed black man,” and “unarmed teen/teenager” were all used to describe the deceased in The New York Times articles analyzed.

The age of the deceased was used to describe him in The New York Times articles. He was described as an “18-year-old” 6 times, an “18-year-old black man” once, and his age of 18 was used to describe him a total of 15 times throughout The New York Times articles. In relation with age, the terms “man” and “teen”/“teenager” were used to describe the deceased. “Man” was used to describe the deceased 3 times while “teen”/“teenager” were used interchangeably a total of 21 times throughout The New York Times articles. Where race and age are both concerned, the deceased was described as a “black teen” or “black teenager” 16 times throughout the articles analyzed. Racially, the deceased was described as “black” 20 times throughout the articles.

The other individual involved in the altercation with the deceased was also identified and described throughout The New York Times articles analyzed. The name “Darren Wilson” was used to describe him a total of 18 times throughout the articles. No other variations of that name were used to describe him. The descriptor most commonly used to describe Darren Wilson throughout the articles was the term “officer” and it was used 29 times throughout the articles analyzed. The term “officer” was also used in conjunction with other descriptors as well. For example, he was described as a “Ferguson police officer” 4 times and a “white officer” 11 times. Racially, the term used to describe the officer was “white” and it was used 11 times throughout The New York Times articles analyzed in this exploratory analysis.

The event as a whole was also analyzed throughout The New York Times articles. Terms used to describe the event overall were “killing,” “shooting,” fatal shooting,” “shooting death,” “police killing,” and “black teen killing.” Lengthy descriptions detailing the event were also given by the authors of The New York Times articles. According to The New York Times articles, there have been varying accounts of the altercation between the deceased and the officer. The accounts do not just vary between police and witnesses, but somewhat also between the many witnesses as a whole. According to the articles, the officer stopped the deceased for walking down the street and blocking traffic. Following the moment when the officer approached the deceased, there was a brief struggle between the deceased and the officer. Some witnesses alleged that the officer’s gun went off inside the patrol car during the struggle between the deceased and the officer while the officer was still inside his vehicle. Once the deceased then began to flee, the officer began firing at him multiple times. At this point, accounts also vary. Some say that the deceased stopped fleeing and turned to the officer in a threatening manner which prompted the officer to fire more shots. Other witnesses say that the deceased was not moving toward the officer but had his hands up in the air when he was killed. According to The New York Times articles, police said that the deceased went for the officer's gun. In sum, the witness accounts generally alleged that the deceased was not fleeing but instead, had his hands in the air in a sign of surrender.

According to The New York Times articles analyzed, the deceased was shot at least 6 times. He was shot twice in the head and 4 times in his right arm. All of the bullets fired were shot into the front of the deceased. Forensic tests from the autopsy of the deceased showed that the blood of the deceased was on the officer's gun. The deceased was shot to death in less than 61 seconds after the officer's call was taken by a dispatcher which said that he had stopped the deceased with another individual. Lastly, the articles stated that the altercation ignited and triggered nights of angry protests.

St. Louis Post Dispatch

The St. Louis Post-Dispatch was also examined in this exploratory analysis. “Michael Brown” was the name used to identify the deceased and it was used 29 times throughout the St. Louis Post-Dispatch articles analyzed. A descriptor used to describe the deceased during the altercation on August 9, 2014 was “unarmed” and it was used a total of 9 times throughout the articles. The deceased was also described as an “unarmed 18-year-old,” an “unarmed teenager,” and an “unarmed black teenager.”

The deceased was described as an “18-year-old” 6 times throughout the St. Louis Post-Dispatch articles analyzed. His age of 18 was used to describe him a total of 15 times throughout the articles. Along with the age of the deceased, the term “teen” or “teenager” were used interchangeably to describe the deceased 3 times. He was also described as a “black teenager” once throughout the St. Louis Post-Dispatch articles analyzed. When it came to race, the term used to describe the deceased was “black” and it was used a total of 4 times.

The other individual involved in the altercation on August 9, 2014 was also identified and described in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch articles used in this analysis. The name of the officer involved, “Darren Wilson,” was used 24 times to identify him throughout the articles. He was also identified as “Wilson” and that occurred 8 times throughout the St. Louis Post-Dispatch articles. The term most used to describe Darren Wilson was “officer.” This term was used a total of 24 times throughout the articles. The term “officer” was also used in conjunction with other words. “Ferguson officer” was used to describe Darren Wilson 15 times and “white Ferguson officer” was used 1 time throughout the articles analyzed. In terms of race, Darren Wilson was described as “white” 3 times.

The St. Louis Post-Dispatch articles were also analyzed to identify how the altercation between the deceased and the officer on August 9, 2014 was framed as a whole. The altercation between the officer and the deceased was identified as a “shooting death,” a “police shooting,” the “shooting death,” and a “tragic death.” The altercation was also described in detail by the authors of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch articles. According to the articles, the officer encountered the deceased walking with a friend in one of the highest concentrated areas of low income housing in the state of Missouri. The articles explain that the officer’s gun was fired once inside the police car during a struggle between the officer and the deceased. According to the articles, the shot that was fired inside the vehicle did not hit anyone. During the struggle with the officer still inside his vehicle, police say that the deceased tried to take the officer’s gun. One article from the St. Louis Post-Dispatch stated that there was no evidence of a struggle on the body of the deceased but another article at a later date explained that there were abrasions on the face of the deceased. When it came to shots fired, the articles explained that the officer fired his gun at least ten times during the altercation, but a private autopsy showed only six of those shots hit the deceased. The medical examiner’s autopsy showed that the deceased was shot several times at a distance but suffered one shot to his thumb that was shot at close range.

According to the St. Louis Post-Dispatch articles analyzed, the officer involved in the altercation and sources close to the officer also had their own accounts of the event. These accounts are different than some from eye-witnesses of the altercation. The articles stated the officer explained the deceased attacked him and that a struggle ensued over the officer’s gun. The officer said that he was able to fire his weapon twice but that the deceased was only hit once during that initial struggle. According to the officer, the deceased ran away which prompted him to call for backup. The radio channel was changed during the struggle with the deceased and the call was not sent out. The officer then pursued the deceased outside of the vehicle. The articles analyzed state that the deceased was killed less than 61 seconds after the initial call was acknowledged by the dispatcher that the officer had stopped the deceased and his friend.

Witnesses of the altercation, however, have varying stories of what occurred. The friend with the deceased at the time of the altercation said that the officer fired one shot inside the police car, one more shot when he exited the police car, and several more shots after that. More witnesses said that the officer was shooting as he chased the deceased outside of the police car. According to witnesses, the deceased turned to face the officer which prompted the officer to pause, but only for a moment. Following the pause, he continued to shoot the deceased. Witnesses said that the deceased had his hands up and surrendering when he was shot and ultimately killed. The St. Louis Post-Dispatch called the officer's action a use of deadly force.

The Huffington Post

Throughout The Huffington Post there are terms used to describe the deceased individual involved in the altercation on August 9, 2014. Two variations of the name of the deceased were used when identifying him. The name “Michael Brown” was used 28 times, and “Mike Brown” was used 1 time when identifying the deceased. The most often used term to describe the deceased in The Huffington Post articles analyzed was “unarmed.” The term “unarmed” was used 19 times throughout the articles. “Unarmed” was also used in conjunction with other terms as well. For example, the deceased was more specifically described as an “unarmed 18-year-old,” an “unarmed African American teenager,” an “unarmed black teenager,” and an “unarmed teen/teenager.”

The age of the deceased was used to describe him within the articles analyzed. He was described as an “18-year-old” 16 times and his age of 18 was mentioned a total of 19 times throughout all of The Huffington Post articles examined in this analysis. A second age descriptor used to describe the deceased was “teen” or “teenager” which were used interchangeably 14 times throughout the articles.

In terms of race, the deceased was described as “black” 15 times throughout the articles. “Black” was also used along with other descriptors. For example, “black youth” was used 1 time and “black teenager” was used 8 times. “African American” was used to racially describe the deceased 1 time throughout The Huffington Post articles analyzed.

The officer involved in the altercation was also identified and described throughout The Huffington Post articles analyzed. The name most used to identify the officer was “Darren Wilson” which was used 22 times, while the name “Wilson” was used 10 times throughout the articles. The term “officer” was used to describe Darren Wilson the most as it was used a total of 35 times throughout The Huffington Post articles analyzed. “Officer” was used in conjunction with other terms to describe him as well. For example, “Ferguson police officer” and “white police officer” were both used. The racial descriptor of “white” was used to describe the officer 12 times. Lastly, the officer was described as a “white policeman” 1 time throughout The Huffington Post articles analyzed.

Articles from the Huffington Post were also analyzed to determine how the altercation between the officer and deceased on August 9, 2014 was framed. Throughout The Huffington Post articles analyzed, brief descriptors were used to describe the event as a whole. The altercation that occurred was described as a “killing,” a “fatal shooting,” a “fatal police shooting,” and a “shooting death.” The altercation between the officer and the deceased was also described in detail. According to The Huffington Post articles analyzed, accounts of the altercation differ as to what led to the fatal shooting. Accounts also vary amongst witnesses and police in regards to what exactly happened during the entire altercation.

According to The Huffington Post articles analyzed, police alleged that a struggle broke out after the officer asked the deceased and his friend to move out of the middle of the street. Ferguson police also alleged that the deceased assaulted the officer. However, eye-witnesses said that the deceased was surrendering or attempting to leave the scene of the struggle when he was killed. Witnesses also said that the officer began firing unprovoked. According to The Huffington Post articles analyzed, the officer gave his own account of the altercation. The officer said that he tried to radio for help but there are no records of that call. The officer said this is due to his radio channel being changed during the struggle with the deceased inside his police car. After the officer called for help, he pursued the deceased on foot outside of the police car. The officer said that the deceased charged towards him which prompted him to fire multiple times. Some witnesses said that the deceased had his hands up in the air in a sign of surrender while others have given similar versions to that of the officer involved.

In terms of details about shots fired at the deceased, The Huffington Post articles state that the deceased was shot at least six times, including twice in the head. A bullet entered the top of the skull of the deceased, which according to the articles, suggests that the head of the deceased was bent forward when he was struck by the bullet. The remaining four shots hit the deceased in his right arm and all of the bullets fired were shot at the front of the deceased's body. Experts outside of the investigation have said that an autopsy of the deceased shows evidence of a struggle that occurred at close range. After the altercation, the articles analyzed stated that the body of the deceased was left in the street for 4 hours and 32 minutes after he was shot. The Huffington Post articles analyzed explained that the officer initiated the altercation with the deceased and that the justification which was provided by the local Ferguson police force did not fit the protocol to be put in place when applying deadly force. Lastly, the articles stated that the killing of the deceased sparked many days of protests.

DISCUSSION

This exploratory analysis aimed to examine the media coverage of the shooting of an unarmed black teen, Michael Brown, by a police officer on August 9, 2014 in Ferguson Missouri. Specifically, articles from four media sources were gathered and examined to determine how the event and individuals involved in the event were framed. Two articles each week between August 10, 2014 (the day after the shooting) and November 21, 2014 were randomly selected and examined individually. In randomly selecting two articles from each week within this time frame, I hoped to examine each news source equally.

The individuals examined in each article were the deceased and the officer involved. The deceased individual was Michael Brown and the officer, Darren Wilson. In each article words used to describe both individuals were gathered and placed into spreadsheets to organize the data and recognize patterns. Many terms were used to describe the deceased throughout the articles in The Wall Street Journal, The New York Times, the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, and The Huffington Post. The term “unarmed” was used to describe the deceased throughout all four media outlets. However, while The Wall Street Journal, The New York Times, and The Huffington Post used the term “unarmed” 19-20 times in total, the St. Louis Post-Dispatch only used this term 9 times. As The Wall Street Journal, The New York Times, and The Huffington Post are well-known national news outlets, it is possible that the frequent use of the term “unarmed” could point at their need to sensationalize news stories in order to reach their larger audiences. The St. Louis Post-Dispatch, as a local news source from Missouri, may not need to sensationalize stories with such a frequent use of the term “unarmed” to constantly describe the deceased.

The full name of the deceased, “Michael Brown”, was used the most to specifically identify the deceased throughout the articles from all four news sources, but this was not a finding that varied dramatically throughout the articles. However, The Wall Street Journal and The New York Times identified the deceased as “Mr. Brown” while the St. Louis Post-Dispatch and The Huffington Post did not. The use of “Mr. Brown” to identify the deceased by The Wall Street Journal and The New York Times was possibly used to refer to the deceased as an adult. Michael Brown was 18-years-old when he was shot and killed and it seems that the line between identifying him as a teenager or as an adult was blurry for the authors of the articles throughout all four news sources. Since the deceased was also described as a teenager by The New York Times and The Wall Street Journal, it is unclear if there is a significance in the use of the name “Mr. Brown” throughout the articles.

The term “man” was used to describe the deceased only by The Wall Street Journal and The New York Times. The term was used twice throughout The Wall Street Journal articles and three times throughout The New York Times articles examined. As both news outlets used the term about the same time, it does not seem significant to discuss a connection with this term and the conservative or liberal backgrounds of The Wall Street Journal and The New York Times. The term “teenager” was used to describe the deceased in all four media outlets. It was used frequently in The Wall Street Journal, The New York Times, and The Huffington Post but was used infrequently in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch. It seems significant to mention that this could also tie in again with the use of the national media outlets (The Wall Street Journal, The New York Times, and The Huffington Post) to grab the attention of a much larger audience. A story of a teenager being shot and killed may hit more close to home to some audience members than if he were described as a man. It appears descriptors were generally used infrequently in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch which points at less of a need to sensationalize their stories as their audience is more localized.

Racially, the deceased was described as black and African American. The deceased was described as black 11 times in The Wall Street Journal articles, 20 times in The New York Times articles, 4 times in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch articles, and 15 times in The Huffington Post articles. Following along with the previously stated idea of sensationalizing news stories in media outlets at a national level, it is possible this rings true with the significance of these findings as well considering the St. Louis Post-Dispatch is a local news source out of Missouri where the event occurred. The deceased was described as “African American” twice in The Wall Street Journal articles and one time in The Huffington Post articles collected and analyzed. As this racial descriptor was used so infrequent and the most times by The Wall Street Journal, perhaps it can be connected with the conservative ties of that news source. However, as it was also used just once by The Huffington Post, it is unclear if a significance can be tied to the description being conservative. Further research could possibly look into the connection of the racial descriptor “African American” and conservative ties.

Along with examining how the deceased was framed throughout the articles in each news outlet, the officer was also analyzed. The main significance found amongst the analysis of how the officer was framed can be seen in the amount of times The New York Times used the term “white” to describe him. The New York Times was also the news outlet to use the term “black” to describe the deceased more times than any other news outlet examined in this study. Relating to the past events in history of police brutality, it is possible to see a connection here. Making distinctions about race in The New York Times between the deceased and the officer shows connections with that of the police beating of Rodney King by a white police officer. Although this connection was not discussed in the articles analyzed, conclusions can be drawn that the distinction of white and black when describing the race of deceased and the officer can relate back to similar events of police brutality throughout history. Constantly seeing each individual described as “white” or “black” brings to the reader’s attention the racial divide amongst the deceased and the officer involved.

The significance in the way the event was framed throughout each news source is quite similar. The Wall Street Journal, The New York Times, the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, and The Huffington Post all described the event as being detailed differently by witnesses and police. The authors of each news source described witness accounts very similarly. For example, witnesses described in each news source alleged that the deceased had his hands in the air in a sign of surrender when he was shot and killed. All four news sources explain that the police, however, had different accounts. The police, as described throughout the four news outlets, alleged that the deceased did not have his hands up in surrender, but instead charged the officer which prompted him to fire his gun multiple times. Stories from each news source about the event and the accounts from witnesses and police did not drastically differ. If anything, the framing of the event became more detailed as more articles were released. This could be due to more information being made to the public as more time went on after the event. In this exploratory analysis, it was not common to see many authors discussing the protests that ensued after the shooting of Michael Brown. Although each news source stated that protests were ignited after his death, details of the protests were not specifically given in the articles analyzed throughout this study.

The St. Louis Post-Dispatch did seem to give more detailed information about minor details as opposed to the other three news outlets. For example, the St. Louis Post-Dispatch was the only news source to identify the friend of the deceased that was walking with him when the altercation with the officer occurred. The St. Louis Post-Dispatch was the only news source to give detailed local information and can be explained by the fact that it is a local news source aiming to reach a local audience that is familiar with the state of Missouri. The St. Louis Post-Dispatch also detailed the total number of bullets fired instead of only detailing the number of bullets that hit the deceased. That can, again, connect with a need for larger news sources to strictly give the sensational details, which in this case included only reporting on how many bullets actually hit the deceased. Lastly, the area in which the shooting occurred was highly detailed in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch. The news source explained that the shooting occurred in one of the largest concentrated areas of low income housing in all of Missouri. As a local news source, the St. Louis Post-Dispatch gave detailed accounts of the story because that is what may have seemed important to local individuals living in Ferguson, Missouri or just Missouri in general at the time. The other news outlets may have solely believed to have an obligation to give detailed accounts of what happened instead of specifically where the event occurred because their audience is not strictly the state of Missouri but the entire nation.

Theoretically, the accounts of the police and witnesses may be looked at using the media framing as described by Nancy Burns. Each news outlet gave both accounts of witnesses and police which varied quite drastically. Many of the witness accounts detailed throughout the articles examined held the deceased as a victim throughout most of the altercation with the officer. Much of the witness accounts explained in the articles detail the deceased surrendering with his hands in the air as he was shot and killed by the officer. Very different from this, police accounts of the incident tell a story in which the deceased charged at the officer prompting the officer to fire multiple shots which ended in the death of Michael Brown. These two accounts frame the victim (which in this case will be the deceased as he was the victim of the shooting) in very different lights. Although the accounts vary, each news source provided detailed descriptions from the witnesses and the police. This leads the reader to make up their mind as to how they wish to view the victim. The Wall Street Journal, The New York Times, the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, and The Huffington Post detailed the event quite similarly from both sides (witness accounts and police accounts) which is significant in that it shows quite consistent journalism throughout all four of these news sources. This sheds a positive light on an honest portrayal of the event that occurred on August 9, 2014 between the deceased and the officer as told by witnesses and the police involved.

As incidents of police force on black individuals is nothing new, the shooting of Michael Brown by a police officer is extremely recent, and therefore has gained much more media attention than incidents in the past. This is due to the expansion of the media over time. Although The Wall Street Journal, The New York Times, and The Huffington Post sensationalized their stories by using specific terms to describe the deceased at a significantly higher rate than the local news source, the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, the event in general was detailed similarly amongst all four news sources. It is with high hopes that the media will continue to detail and describe events such as the one that occurred on August 9, 2014, in a non-biased manner. In the shooting of Michael Brown by Officer Darren Wilson, many different accounts were given and each news source explained both sides of these accounts.

In this exploratory analysis of The Wall Street Journal, The New York Times, the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, and The Huffington Post, strengths and limitations can be seen. A strength of this research is that it was done roughly one year after the shooting of Michael Brown occurred. The closeness of the research and the shooting death means that it has not been done previously to the knowledge of the researcher. This compilation of brand new data may be used to further research the shooting of Michael Brown specifically or media framing of police shootings in general. Bringing to light these findings so soon after the event can educate individuals on not only one of the most recent incidents of police brutality on a black individual but also the framing used by many different media outlets. As this was the first of its kind, this research did have limitations as well. The data in this study was not used along with any type of software which may have hindered the ability to identify even more significant findings and correlations. This research was exploratory in nature which may have been a limitation as well. Future research could use the data compiled here in a hypothesis driven analysis.
